Through Switzerland

Today was a great drive. We started off in France, traversed the north west corner of Switzerland, kissed Austria for a few kilometres and ended up in Germany. We took this route because it was the shortest route suggested by the GPS. I was a little bit sceptical thinking that we may be driving over mountainous terrain. In fact it was the easiest drive we have done. The road system followed the valley floors and ran alongside numerous large lakes. The countryside was green, clean and beautiful. Village after village of lovely houses with at least one spire (denoting the church we supposed).

We took our time and stopped for lunch and an afternoon cuppa. We had hoped to stay in a road side overnight parking place. They had been plentiful the whole day - until we decided to choose one and bed down for the night. We gave up eventually and headed for a caravan park at Lindau - a place we stayed 2 years ago. It is a village on Lake Constance. Sig has a very sore leg and is literally incapacitated with it. Luckily he can drive, but walking and bike riding are not on the agenda. He immediately bedded down to rest and I made tea and then went for a great ride beside the lake. Tomorrow we will be with the Smiths in their time-share place on the German - Swiss border.

VROOM VEROOM VROOM Not just one but two Fararri's - no sooner did we see them then in a flash they were gone. Mind blowing.

TUNNEL Why waste land? Big factory on top and long tunnel underneath. Dual purpose.

REGISTRATION NUMBERS The Swiss don't believe in short number plates. This was the shortest we have seen. Saw one with 9 numbers today.
