Picturesque town

We had just two simple tasks today. Heather wanted to attend the Steyr market day and find the Tourist Information Centre while I desperately needed a hair cut. We did indeed complete our tasks.

Steyr is a gorgeous place. We walked down to the old town and quickly came across the usual stalls of clothing, ornaments, food and eateries. There were a number of buskers who added to the ambience as we strolled slowly around taking it all in. Heather was in her element - checking out clothing for everyone else, gin that she never drinks, gifts that she would love to own and book shops for bike maps to inform our future bike riding adventures. No gin, no clothes, no gifts but yes, a detailed map showing bike paths for hundreds of kilometres around this area. Meanwhile I walked around and snapped the passing parade and the beautifully decorated buildings.

We moved on to finding a barber and eventually came across Friseur Roy who expertly snipped and trimmed and made me into a new man again. Heather was impressed with her new man. We ambled over the river and back into town and quite by accident came across the Tourist Info Office. We now have another detailed map (free) of bike tracks for hundreds of kilometres around Steyr. Home for lunch and a relax for Heather while I went for a short bike ride to test out one of the bike circuits. Another good day.
