Wandering

The aim today was to travel off the main roads and go further south than we have been before. The difficulty with navigating this area by going from village to village (with the GPS) is that the area has few villages big enough to make it to our map and the landscape was getting quite precipitous. We ended up mainly sticking to the banks of the Enns River. A lot of the time we had trouble figuring out where we actually were.

Despite that, we had an enjoyable three hours of ambling slowly around and viewing beautiful scenery (as usual). The town of Reichraming was our main stopping point. A walk along the river through some lovely autumn colours was delightful. Forests are visibly turning to browns and yellows.

The picture of the cow head opposite was on a building in Reichraming. We were undecided whether it was the order of the Worshipful Axe Murderers or a butcher shop established in 1960. We also had to wonder what an Expert Lumplecker was. Google later told us he was “a regional electro fach-handler”!!!

The other beautiful sight today were the reflections in the slow moving water of the Enns. The water itself is a deep aqua colour and is crystal clear.
